"Scorn to no Master, of no Sect am I."

MR. WENTWORTH'S PLAN OF IMMIGRATION.

It was natural that in the debate on Mr. WENTWORTH'S motion for the appointment of a Select Committee on Immigration, coming on as it did a few hours after the news of Earl GREY'S retirement arrived in the colony, some allusion should be made to that happy event. Nor was the topic irrelevant to the question before the House. The whole policy of the ex-Minister, from the beginning to the end of his official career, was adverse to that of a branch of colonial interests to which the question related. Notwithstanding the solicitude professed in his despatches for the due supply of our labour market, notwithstanding those occasional anticipations of our wants which seemed to verify the sincerity of his professions, and for which the COLONIAL SECRETARY thought his lordship entitled to the gratitude of the colonists, there can be no rational doubt that Earl GREY'S pertinacity on the transportation and land questions operated as the most effectual of all checks on the emigration both of capital and of labour to the shores of Australia. As was well observed by the Times, "one would have thought that no experience was required to prove that people will not go four times as far to pay five times as much in Australia for land as they must pay in America." But the fallen Minister acted all through as though he believed that neither the length of the voyage, nor the high price of land, nor even the presence of Britain's transported malefactors, could deter people from giving to Australia a preference over the United States. And thus acting, he raised a barrier against emigration which not even the attractions of our gold could induce people to surmount. Mr. WENTWORTH was therefore quite in order when he exultingly referred to the fact, that "the malignant star which had so long shied its baneful influence on the colonies of Great Britain, had now sunk in darkness, never, he fervently hoped, to be again in the ascendant." In this exultation the whole Council seemed to participate, the COLONIAL SECRETARY forming the only visible exception.

The plan of emigration of which Mr. WENTWORTH presented to the House a general outline, leaving all matters of detail to be adjusted by the Committee, appears to be on the whole a decided improvement on the existing system. In the first place, he proposes to disengage entirely with the services of the Emigration Commissioners. This board has never been popular with the colonists; it has never had their confidence, nor do we think it has deserved their confidence. We do not remember any instance in which, when questions of importance have been referred to the Commissioners from the Colonial Office, their reports have not been adverse to colonial interests. As regards the most important question of all, the price of land, they have uniformly employed the whole influence of their pens in opposing the recommendations of the Legislative Council, and in vindicating the policy of Downing-street. On all matters, indeed, connected with land and emigration, they have served as the mere tools of the Minister, ever ready to do his bidding, however repugnant to the known wishes of those whose funds they handled, and for whose benefit their department was ostensibly created. Their want of zeal in our service, or their lack of judgment in the performance of their duties, was strikingly displayed in the facts last communicated by one of our London Correspondents, that while Mrs. CHITKISS could get plenty of emigrants, but had no funds, the Commissioners, with money in abundance, could get no emigrants! We think, therefore, that in wishing to renounce all connexion whatever with these functionaries, Mr. WENTWORTH exercises a very sound and a very safe discretion.

Another feature of Mr. WENTWORTH'S plan, and the main one, is, that instead of inviting immigration from the United Kingdom, we should invite immigration on equal terms from "all Europe." In a subsequent part of his speech, he states the leading principle of his plan to be, that it would open out the privilege of sending emigrants to this colony to "the whole world." To reconcile the apparent contradiction, we must presume "the whole world" to have been mentioned as a figure of speech signifying the whole European world. Even in this guarded sense, the scheme is sufficiently gigantic, and ought not to be adopted without very grave consideration as to its bearings on our social and political interests. In the first place, we imagine no British subject would think it desirable that our race should be swamped by the intrusion of foreigners. A fair proportion of immigrants from the Continent, such as Germany, Sweden, and Norway, judiciously selected, would be a welcome accession to our industrial strength. But such an immigration of foreigners, strangers to our language, our customs, and our laws, as should cause them eventually to outnumber the colonists of British birth or descent, would of course effect a change in our whole social fabric, destroying our identity as an Anglo-Saxon community. In the present state of Europe, Mr. WENTWORTH'S plan, carried out to the letter, without restriction or qualification of any kind, would be by no means unlikely to lead to such a result; for no doubt the lovers of peace and tranquillity will be ready to flock by tens of thousands from that region of tumult and of terror to that part of the world offering to them a quiet home.

In the next place, it is to be feared that of the foreigners whom Mr. WENTWORTH'S alluring offer would draw to this colony, a large proportion would consist of men of dangerous political character—democrats of the deepest dye, republicans, socialists, anarchists. Under the Military Despotism to which Louis NAPOLEON has given so fearful an ascendancy, Europe is too hot to hold such turbulent spirits; and in order to escape the bayonet, the guillotine, or the pike, plantation, myriads of them would be too glad to accept free passages to this land of freedom and of plenty. To this point the Council would do well to turn their most serious attention.

The other parts of Mr. WENTWORTH'S project we must reserve for consideration on a future day.

We yesterday compared Earl GREY with Sinbad the Sailor. For this we owe Sinbad and his numerous friends an apology, which we hereby tender. We need hardly say that the comparison was a mere lappus pennis, and that it was to that disreputable Old Man of the Sea who clung to Sinbad's shoulders, and for so long a period resisted his efforts to shake him off, that we referred.

We have been compelled from want of space to postpone a quantity of material already in type, including a number of advertisements.

MAURITIUS.

We have Mauritius papers to the 23rd of April, but we observe nothing of material interest in the files before us. On the 16th, the Governor communicated to the Legislative Council a letter from Sir Bird, emigration agent at Bombay, announcing that the emigration of Coolies to the island would be carried on without interruption during the whole year. It was expected that 5000 labourers, exclusive of women, would be sent during that period.

The new Masters and Servants Act had been passed. The Bill for the regulation of emigration had also passed the Council. On the 21st, the Hon. Mr. Bird, emigration agent at Bombay, was read a second time. The London and Paris correspondence of the Mercure is principally limited to the affairs of France, and the imminent dislocation of the French Republic.

The Paris correspondent warmly espouses the cause of Louis Napoleon.
